Why financial wellness matters

Employees are managing more financial complexity than ever before. Retirement planning, debt, budgeting, emergency savings, college savings and major life decisions all compete for attention.

For many employees, the challenge is not a lack of information. It's knowing where to begin, what to prioritize and what action to take next.

When financial wellness is connected to the broader benefits experience, it can help employees see how everyday financial decisions relate to longer-term goals. That connection may make education feel more relevant, benefits easier to understand and retirement planning more actionable.

For plan sponsors, financial wellness may help strengthen the benefits experience, support retirement readiness and encourage employees to engage more meaningfully with the resources available to them.

A personalized approach to financial wellness

Mariner's Financial Wellness solution is built around four connected pillars that help employees access the right level of support at the right time.

1. Financial wellness technology

Our AI-powered financial wellness platform is designed to serve as a personal financial guide for employees. By drawing on each employee's paycheck, benefits elections, goals and available plan resources, the platform can provide personalized answers, budgeting and cash-flow tools, goal tracking, retirement calculators, debt management resources, educational content and next-step recommendations. The platform can launch in as little as two weeks, integrates with many payroll systems and provides reporting to help employers measure engagement and impact.

2. On-demand financial coaching

Employees can connect with experienced financial coaches for personalized guidance on budgeting, debt reduction, emergency savings, college savings, retirement readiness, investment basics and major life events.

Why Mariner?

Many financial wellness programs focus on one part of the employee experience, such as technology, education or coaching. Mariner brings these components together in one integrated solution.

This connected ecosystem can help employees move from access to action while giving plan sponsors a more comprehensive way to support financial confidence, retirement readiness and overall employee well-being.
